The new age of agriculture

Thanks to technological advancement, agriculture is on the cusp of another evolution. Maybe it won't be as dramatic as a century ago, when tractors took the place of horses and oxen. Artificial intelligence and other smart technologies will allow ag producers to reach unprecedented levels of production, from managing livestock to cultivating crops to managing their growing capital needs.

TOP CHALLENGES OF AG LENDERS

Future-focused lenders recognize a new age in lending is taking shape. As one of them you're noticing changes in needs and expectations, and they're happening now. These expectations present challenges for independent community banks:

- Online loans that provide fast answers and quick access to capital
- Expanded lending ability for agricultural operations

It's a tough ask for lenders to offer

quick-turnaround loans and expanded lending without taking on more risk.

When should ag lenders enter the secondary market?

Agricultural lenders play an important role in supporting farmers, ranchers and growers in their local ag economy.

Since 1990, the number of ag lenders issuing farm loans has decreased. Yet the value of their lending power is booming, and so is their share of the farm loan market.

The role of ag lenders is more critical than ever.

1990

- 4,100 farm loans by all banks
- ~$50 billion in farm loans by all banks
- ~$10 billion in farm loans by farm banks

2022

- 1,488 farm banks
- $190 billion in farm loans by all banks
- $103.1 billion in farm loans by farm banks

FILLING THE ROLE IN AN EVOLVING MARKET

Agriculture has proven to be a volatile industry and with that, ag lending trails those cycles. That's just reality in the face of shifting market forces and conditions, including commodity prices, production levels, weather events, widespread viruses and other headwinds that are beyond the producer's control.

To hedge against losses, ag lenders have followed best practices in credit and underwriting. They also rely on their staff of lenders who come in the door with knowledge of regional agricultural practices and trends, to provide expert guidance through the lending process.

Conservative banking practices can be a double-edged sword in a time of growth. On one hand, ag lenders have deep roots in their communities. The median farm bank is 112 years old, according to the ABA. These lenders have the background and understanding to provide expert guidance that producers and growers have come to rely on.

Ag borrowers may lack access to the lending products they seek. Long-term fixed-rate loans are attractive to producers operating on tight margins. However, such offerings present risk to lenders.

Ag lenders that find themselves in that position make great candidates for secondary market financing options.
